Brisque Virus Protection Advisory

The Kodak Brisque software product family is based on the IBM AIX operating system, which is a UNIX operating system dialect. The Brisque product has been on the market since 1996 and has accumulated a customer base of close to 10,000 units. During the entire life cycle of the product, we have not received any reports of problems that were caused by virus penetration of Brisque servers. In any case, the AIX operating system includes built-in software protection tools that can be set to run automatically at predefined times, using the Maintenance script.

The Brisque version 5.0 software introduced multiplatform Brisque client software. This architecture enables all Brisque operations to be controlled from every customer-owned Macintosh or Windows-based personal computer. At these customer sites, we assume that the customer's system administration department deploys effective virus protection tools. Kodak will not be responsible for virus penetration of customer computers on which the Brisque client is installed. It is recommended that customers make sure that their computers are protected.
